THE BUSINESS FARMER'S CORNER

MARKETING FRUIT

By EDWARD K. PARKINSON, Expert Agriculturist.

There are four ways of disposing of orchard products—selling the fruit on the trees to a buyer, who comes to the orchard and makes a lump sum offer; selling through a commission merchant, selling through a fruit growers' association or selling to the consumer direct.

The first method involves the least trouble, but the seller receives the lowest price, as the buyer has not only the work of picking, etc., but must sell the fruit to a middleman. Moreover, buyers will not, as a rule, contract for small orchards, the expense of bringing men, etc., being too great. However, if the owner has an orchard of several acres and is unable to superintend the work himself, selling in this way is both practical and profitable.

Selling through a commission merchant is often very satisfactory, particularly if the orchard is not near any market, and if care is taken to look up the merchant's financial standing, for the commission man naturally does his best to sell to advantage. In selling in this way, write or telegraph the merchant before shipping, that he may be prepared to receive and dispose of the fruit at once.

To sell through a fruit growers' association one must become a member, and this may be done by writing to the state department of agriculture for the names of the associations in the state and their financial standing; also by writing to the secretary and applying for membership. These societies undertake to sell the fruit of their members in the best markets. In fact, it is not unusual for fruit growers' associations to take charge of a crop from the time it becomes ripe, picking, packing and selling the same, the grower simply cashing the check he receives as the result of his year's work.

Selling to the consumer direct is an excellent method of disposing of one's produce in more ways than one if the farm happens to be near a town or city. In the first place, better prices are obtained for the fruit, and not infrequently a market is opened for eggs, poultry, potatoes or anything delectable one may choose to raise. There is also the interest of personal contact and the change of the town sights and sounds, which, to a country dweller who doesn't live among them, is often an agreeable diversion. However, to sell a crop of apples by the bushel or quart, for instance, necessitates a storage building of sufficient capacity to hold the entire output, so that one may keep a crop for the best prices. Such a building need not be an expensive affair, but it must be frost proof.

PREVAILING FAD OF CRIME PLAYS.

"The Master Mind" and "Within the Law" Lead in Popularity

Since "Within the Law" and "The Master Mind" established their history making runs, respectively at the Eltinge Theater and the Harris Theater, New York, playwrights have vied with each other in their efforts to present to theater goers plays where the central figures are criminals and where the principal situations have to do with crime or its detection. In some instances authors have gone even beyond the limit prescribed by conventionality—a polite term for decency—and introduced characters in their plays that were nothing short of revolting. This overzeal has recently resulted in the suspension of two dramatic offerings in New York and the temporary closing of two of its principal theaters.

While many interesting characters can be evolved by playwrights from people of the underworld they only interest through whatever characteristically they possess that, though vicious, compels admiration generally by its ingenuity of virility. The public have no sympathy or interest in stage characters that are simply evil and are quick to resent the introduction of simply degenerate types or characters that represent the unspeakable element of the underworld. It was the stage presentations of such types that led to the theater closings referred to above.

In "Within the Law," with a couple of exceptions, almost every character was likable, and the same may be said with even more emphasis of "The Master Mind." In the latter play its author, Daniel D. Carter, presents through most gripping lines and situations an interesting struggle between two master minds—the crook and the district attorney; each dominating individually striving for the ascendancy, and flushes with an astonishing climax, showing that the innocent victim of the crook, a young girl, who as a means of revenge upon the district attorney he has forced into a life of crime and succeeds in marrying to the attorney, proves to be the master mind of them all and conquers through love where the machinations of hate fail.

Scene between the district attorney and Lucene, alias Maggie Flint, in "The Master Mind," an intensely interesting play of politics and intrigue, which will be presented here at an early date.
